LAMBEAU LEAP A HIT

It was safety LeRoy Butler who first performed the leap in 1993, but it was receiver Robert Brooks who made it an artform. Now just about every Packers player jumps into the stands at Lambeau Field following touchdowns this season.

The fans love it. But Green Bay is probably the only place the "leap" could be done... safely.

For instance, if the Bears jumped into the crowd after a rare touchdown at Soldier Field, they would more than likely be beat up. (Then again, that's understandable.)

In New York, (what few Jets and Giants fans that would be at the game), would probably hold the player for ransom.

And who knows what might happen in San Francisco. But, it would be a different story with the Cowboys. It would be the fans who would be fearful of their lives if ever Michael Irvin was about to leap in their section!

FEE FI FO FAIRS...

Two more teams have decided to drop team nicknames that were construed as offensive to Native Americans. Miami (Ohio) University's board of trustees voted 7-1 to drop the name "Redskins." And the Syracuse (N.Y.) Chiefs of the International League will become the SkyCheifs when the Class AAA baseball club opens a new stadium in 1997.

Coincidentally, North American grizzlies at zoos and in the wild say that they are insulted, disgusted and repulsed that the NFL affiliation in Chicago call themselves "bears." Donkeys... maybe, but definitely not bears. The bears say if the football team doesn't change their name, they'll change theirs.

SPEAKING OF THE BEARS

They suck.

AND THE SUN SHINES ON THE BAY

Did you hear that ABC asked the people of Green Bay to leave their house lights on during the Monday Night Football game at Lambeau Field September 9th? They wanted to make sure that the NFL's smallest city was visible from the Goodyear blimp camera. Two words: zoom in.

DIS AIN'T MY TOILET

Among the items sold at an auction of sports-related memorabilia from Cleveland Stadium this week was a toilet from the suite of Browns owner Art Modell who has been criticized for moving the team to Baltimore. The toilet was sold for $2,700 to the owner of a nightclub in Cleveland. The new owner said that he "wanted to see where Art Modell made all of his business decisions." It will be known as Art's one and only "Super Bowl." Dis ain't Art's toilet, but it's a close facsimile.

BEAR HUNTIN' NEXT SUNDAY

Iron your anti-Bears t-shirts and get ready to sing several verses of the "Bears Still Suck Polka." The Packers invade Soldier Field next Sunday at 1pm and we're looking forward to your support. Go Pack!
